COME AND TAKE IT

2011 ANNUAL REPORT of the TEXAS PUBLIC POLICY FOUNDATION
I n 2011, Texans commemorated the 175th anniversary of the Texas revolution—and in this Annual Report on the Texas Public Policy Foundation, we are proud to tell you that we have conducted ourselves in the spirit of the original Texas revolutionaries.

At the dawn of 1836, the struggle for liberty in Texas looked uncertain. In the autumn of the preceding year, many victories were won: San Antonio de Bexar was seized in the name of freedom, and the Gonzales cannon was successfully defended. But as the new year came, so too did the army of Santa Anna—and with it rode the forces of despotism, dictatorship, and deprivation.

The flame of Texas liberty seemed set to be extinguished barely after it was lit.

At the dawn of 2011, the cause of Texas liberty was also under threat: not from a Mexican army bent upon imposing its will, but from the myriad forces in politics and policy who declared that at long last it was time for Texas to become a big-spending, big-taxing, big-government state.

Some of those forces were in Washington, D.C., where the ambitions of the big-government crowd are at a fever pitch. We took the fight to them in the name of federalism and freedom, not just with our ordinary policy work—but with the establishment of the Laffer Center for Supply-Side Economics.

This is one of the Foundation’s signal accomplishments of 2011. Dr. Arthur Laffer—renowned economist, warrior for liberty, and one of the seminal minds of the Reagan Revolution—has reposed his name and his legacy with us. For our part, we are privileged to work directly with him and his colleagues in our continuing engagement in the fight for freedom. The launch of the Laffer Center this past year was just the beginning: we will produce analyses, commentary, and research to further the supply-side mission in 2012 and in the years to come—and show that a policy institute in Austin, Texas, can have a truly national impact.

Also on the national stage, we spent 2011 defending Texas from the various media and political attacks that accompanied the launch of the national election season. When Texas and its model of limited government and individual responsibility came under assault, the Foundation was there. Whether on television (including MSNBC, Fox News, and the BBC) or in international print media (including The New York Times, The Economist, The Wall Street Journal, and Le Monde), or in our own Texas Model series of research and commentaries, the Foundation’s personnel were ready and able to answer the call to stand up for Texas.

We could hardly have asked for a better way to commemorate our Revolution.

Not all the foes of liberty last year were in D.C. Some of them were right here in Texas. Entering the 82nd legislative session, we were told several things:

We were told that the Texas state budget shortfall was too big to fill with cuts alone.

We were told that the rainy day fund had to be spent.

We were told that taxes in some form had to be raised.

We were told that the low-tax, limited-government model that made Texas great had finally failed.

Everything we were told was wrong.

Just because they were wrong doesn’t mean they were not popular. You remember as well as we do that this was the consensus in Austin and at the Texas Capitol in the first months of 2011. Standing against the arrayed forces of the big government crowd’s conventional wisdom were the Governor, the Texas Public Policy Foundation—and you.

We all know the story of what happened in 1836. We know the terrible defeats suffered by the forces of freedom.

We know of the martyrs of the Alamo.

We know of the sacrifices at Goliad.

We know of the panic of the Runaway Scrape.

You can all go to hell; I will go to Texas.

—David Crockett
But we also know what happened when Sam Houston’s army chose to stand and fight on a small field at a small place called San Jacinto.

Standing and fighting made all the difference—in 1836, and in 2011.

This Foundation recognized the danger upon Texas—and we knew that what was at stake was nothing less than the prosperity and liberty of our great state. That’s why, beginning in March, we took the lead in assembling the Texans for a Conservative Budget coalition. This coalition assembled the pro-liberty leaders in our state, and welded them into a cohesive force to let Austin know that Texans want—and will always want—truly limited government.

We led the way in rejecting the contentions of the big-government, big-state tax forces.

We said that the shortfall could be covered with spending cuts.

We said there was plenty of excess left in the state budget.

We said that government had to live within its means.

We said that the failures of our politicians should not be made good on the backs of Texans households. We stiffened the spines and strengthened the hearts of our allies and friends in the Texas Legislature. We provided them with the intellectual, and more importantly, the moral foundation that they needed to do the right thing for Texas.

The result of this extraordinary effort was obvious.

There were no new taxes.

The rainy day fund was not spent.

The shortfall was covered by a series of aggressive and necessary cuts.

The Texas state budget was balanced on the terms that Texans demanded.

Thanks to this Foundation and the leadership of Texas conservatives from the Governor down to the unknown activist, the 82nd Texas Legislature passed the first Texas state budget in over half a century that was smaller than its predecessor.

When we consider the big issues facing not just Texas, but the nation—especially the big issues of the growth of government, the management of public debt, and the crushing burdens of the entitlement state—the magnitude of our accomplishment is difficult to understated. In the past decade, we’ve become accustomed to Texas leading the way in multiple spheres: in economic growth, in employment, in industrial development, and not least in liberty.

We learned the lessons of Sam Houston and we learned the lessons of Texas’ Revolution 175 years ago: when the time comes to stand and fight—we can, we do, and we win.

This was the big story of 2011 for the Foundation. But it wasn’t the only story. Texas accomplished so very much in 2011.

Small-business tax relief was secured for more than 40,000 companies around the state. Through 2014, Texas businesses earning less than $1 million annually will be exempt from paying the Texas Franchise Tax.

Texas property owners will now have much greater protection from unconstitutional takings of private property via eminent domain.

A number of cost containment measures were enacted in statewide health care. The legislation included the Health Care Compact that would allow Texas to reform Medicaid for long-term sustainability and regain our state sovereignty in health care.

The Foundation’s work supported the passage of “Loser Pays” lawsuit reform which significantly reduces the incentives to file frivolous lawsuits; increases access to the courts for legitimate cases; and enhances our state’s pro-business, pro-growth climate.

With the help of our detailed research and practical policy recommendations, legislation was passed that clarifies and reaffirms landowners’ real property right to groundwater beneath their land.

As a result of our efforts to educate policymakers on the need to stop the uncontrolled growth of the federal government, Texas passed legislation calling for a balanced budget amendment to the Constitution.

In a landmark victory for the Foundation, the Texas Youth Commission and the Texas Juvenile Probation Commission were combined into a single agency.

Legislation was passed, with our help, that will shift higher education funding in Texas toward a formula based on student success measures, as opposed to funding based on enrollment. The Legislature also increased transparency and accountability by requiring that facility data be made publicly available online to help students make informed decisions about higher education.

This is our 2011 record. This is the record of a think tank that is entrepreneurial, aggressive, principled, and—most importantly—effective. It is accurate to describe us as a think tank, but that is not the entirety of who we are.

We do not just think: we act. And when we act, we do so with clarity, and with an eye toward the decision for liberty.

Now we have entered 2012. This will likely be, as you well know, one of the most momentous years—not just in the history of Texas, but in the history of the United States. What we did in 2011, extraordinary as it was, was mere prelude to what we must do now.

This year is the year in which the victories of 2011 must be translated into enduring change. This is the year in which the seeds of success in 2013 are planted. We must be ready.

We will win—and in doing so, we will show two things. We will show that our reasoned belief in the power and efficacy of freedom remains undiminished. And we will show that the inspirational power of the Texas revolution is not merely a thing for anniversary years—but a constant and enduring presence in our daily lives.

Dear friends, we are so blessed to wake up every day under the big sky of the Lone Star State. That blessing and the heritage that comes with it are sacred trusts. At the Texas Public Policy Foundation, we defend that trust every day.

And we are proud to do it in your company.

In Memoriam

William A. McMinn
1930-2011

The Foundation acknowledges with great sadness the passing of one of our heroes—Chairman Emeritus Bill McMinn. He served for many years on the Foundation’s Board, and our growth and success during his tenure is a direct credit to his guidance and his passion for liberty. This warm, gentle, loving man was deeply committed to Texas, to freedom, and to the founding principles of our country. The cornerstone he laid now supports a great edifice, and we who remain in the light of his works are forever in his debt. We will miss you, dear friend.

Holding the Line on Spending

The Foundation’s mission is to promote and defend liberty, personal responsibility, and free enterprise in Texas and the nation by educating and affecting policymakers and the Texas public policy debate with academically sound research and outreach.

In 2011, during the 82nd Texas Legislature, the Texas Public Policy Foundation led the charge in the ongoing battle to limit exorbitant government spending, urging lawmakers to “hold the line.” With its core principles of promoting fiscal responsibility and limited growth in government, the Foundation realized the need for vigilance where appropriations, spending, and mounting debt were concerned.

The Foundation’s Center for Fiscal Policy worked tirelessly to educate both the public and the Legislature on how to balance the budget without raising taxes or increasing spending. The Center also met with leading members within the Tea Party movement in Texas via weekly conference calls that shared these same messages.

The Foundation promoted a measure that would have required a two-thirds supermajority of the Legislature to raise taxes, advised the Legislature against creating a personal income tax, cautioned lawmakers against “fixing” the margin tax in such a way that would damage the economy, and urged the Legislature to adopt the Texas Taxpayer Savings Grant program. The Center for Fiscal Policy was also personally invited by House Ways and Means Chairman Harvey Hilderbran to lay out proposals for revising the state’s Tax Code at a hearing in spring 2012.

This effort was a success, as the Legislature exercised fiscal restraint by adopting an All Funds budget for 2012-13 that, for the first time in nearly 50 years, appropriates less than the previous biennium. At $172.3 billion, the state’s 2012-13 All Funds budget appropriates $10 billion less than the amount in the 2010-11 General Appropriations Act (GAA).

Also during the legislative session, Arlene Wohlgemuth, the Foundation’s executive director and director of the Center for Health Care Policy, joined Fox 7’s Good Day Austin as a weekly featured guest, updating viewers on fiscal matters.

The Foundation and its allies formed the Texans for a Conservative Budget coalition, which persuaded the Texas Legislature to balance the 2012-13 budget without raising taxes or tapping the state’s rainy day fund. To support these efforts, the Foundation created a series of 10 television commercials for broadcast in key markets across the state during the budget debate. The ad campaign was proclaimed by the Texas Tribune as “the most well known” commercials of the session, containing “a broad and clear-cut message.”

Medicaid poses an imminent threat to the health care system. Medicaid makes up roughly one-fourth of our state’s budget and is growing at an unsustainable rate. It fails as an adequate system for the financing and delivery of health care, as low reimbursement rates have caused almost two-thirds of the state’s doctors to refuse to accept Medicaid patients, thus restricting access to quality care for Texans.

PUBLIC HEALTH CARE PROGRAMS

Medicaid makes up roughly one-fourth of our state’s budget and is growing at an unsustainable rate. It fails as an adequate system for the financing and delivery of health care, as low reimbursement rates have caused almost two-thirds of the state’s doctors to refuse to accept Medicaid patients, thus restricting access to quality care for Texans.

Fighting for a Healthy Texas

The Center for Health Care Policy published a detailed analysis entitled “The Big Squeeze,” discussing how spending cuts or tax increases are necessary to maintain the current Medicaid program. This was followed by an in-depth study of alternatives to more effectively provide medical care to low-income individuals called “Medicaid Reform: Constructive Alternatives to a Failed Program.”

The Health Care Compact, Medicaid Waiver bill, and the quality-based reform bill were all passed during the special session as SB 7. The Health Care Compact, a concept originated by the Foundation, was attached to the quality-based reform bill, giving states that join the ability to craft their own health care plans and programs without interference from Washington, D.C. This type of state flexibility is crucial to bringing Medicaid costs under control.

To push back against the stranglehold that ObamaCare is placing on the health care insurance marketplace, the Center worked with policymakers in Texas and other states to support efforts to put health care decisions back into the hands of the individual and out of the hands of the federal government. To this end, the Center for Health Care Policy and Center for Tenth Amendment Studies submitted the Foundation’s first amicus brief in Florida, et al. v. HHS, the multi-state lawsuit against ObamaCare. Writing for the Foundation as amicus curiae, Mario Loyola filed the brief in support of the 26 states challenging the constitutionality of President Obama’s health care reform law.

HEALTH CARE REGULATION

In addition to reforming government-provided health care, health insurance needs to be made more affordable for everyone. This requires freeing the health care market from unnecessary regulations. The Foundation has long been opposed to mandated benefits on health insurance. Believing consumers should be free to decide what their insurance covers, the Center for Health Care Policy stood against numerous bills during the 82nd Texas Legislature that would have mandated new benefits. Ultimately, none of these bills were passed into law.

EFFICIENCY IN HIGHER EDUCATION

To ensure that higher education reforms remain at the forefront of the Texas and national conversations, the Foundation introduced its first Center for Higher Education director, Dr. Thomas K. Lindsay, who brings more than two decades of experience in higher education leadership, instruction, and reform to the Foundation. His extensive credentials include service as president of Shimer College in Chicago, Illinois; as provost and executive vice president at Seton Hall University in South Orange, New Jersey; and as provost and vice president for academic affairs at the University of Dallas.

The Foundation’s Center for Higher Education has consistently advocated for policies that promote online education, which studies have shown to be not only far less expensive but also of equal or greater educational value than traditional, face-to-face education. In the 2011 legislative session, a bill was passed requiring that public institutions of higher education submit plans for making their four most popular degree plans available online, providing greater affordability and increased access to public higher education.

In addition, skyrocketing tuition is pricing our top public universities out of the reach of middle-class families. This crisis is not Texas’ alone. Nationally, over the last quarter-century, college tutions have jumped four times faster than inflation. The Center has been fighting—in print, on the air, and before the Legislature—to end this war on the middle class.

TRANSPARENCY AND ACCOUNTABILITY

Spending taxpayer dollars without transparency or accountability is unforgivable. To this end, the Center worked for reforms that would deliver greater transparency such as HB 736, which provides parents and students with a clearer picture of their educational investment. Greater accountability on the part of our public universities was rewarded when Governor Perry signed HB 9—initiating fundamental change to the method by which Texas universities are funded. For decades, so-called “formula funding” rewarded universities on the basis of the number of students they enroll, rather than on learning outcomes. As a result of this new legislation, our universities will now be held accountable for the task of preparing Texas graduates to compete nationally and globally.

In April, the Center for Higher Education hosted a half-day higher education conference featuring panel discussions on higher education affordability, the future of higher education, and the balance between research and teaching. The program concluded with a luncheon and remarks by Amity Shlaes, author of The Forgotten Man. In June, the Center hosted a Lone Star Issues lecture and book signing with Naomi Schaefer Riley, author of The Faculty Lounges and Other Reasons You Won’t Get the Education You Paid For.

At the August 2011 University of Texas Board of Regents meeting, system chancellor Francisco Cigarroa laid out his Framework for Excellence, with several of the recommendations stemming from the Foundation’s efforts in higher education reforms—specifically regarding online degree programs, increasing four-year graduation rates, and using effective incentives to reward great teachers.
The Center for Tenth Amendment Studies works to restore the Constitutional balance between the states and the federal government

In addition, the Center held a Policy Primer on “Protecting Self-Government in the States Through Interstate Compacts.”

The Center also fought to protect our liberty from federal policies that would stifle energy production and job creation in the name of pseudo-science. Through sound research that exposes the fallacy and illegality of EPA’s regulatory avalanche, the federal war on our energy sources, and of using animals that are not endangered to turn our economy upside down, the Center will continue to move forward on this important issue to rein in EPA’s heavy hand.

During the 82nd session, Center director Mario Loyola was invited to testify 10 times before the Texas House Select Committee on State Sovereignty, three times before the Texas Senate Finance Committee, and before the Senate and House State Affairs Committees. In addition, he was invited to testify before the Colorado Senate Finance Committee on April 26.

FEDERALISM

The Center for Tenth Amendment Studies worked tirelessly in 2011 to educate both the public and our leaders about the Framers’ vision of a federal Constitution, how it was meant to protect our liberty, and how it was meant to prevent a tyranny of the majority. The Center actively supported resolutions in the 82nd session that would have presented an “Article V application” for Congress to convene a convention for the limited purpose of proposing a balanced budget amendment with spending limitations to the states for ratification.

In the U.S. Congress, senators presented a superb balanced budget amendment proposal, S.J. Res. 10, which would balance the budget, cap spending at 18 percent of GDP, and require supermajorities for any tax or debt-ceiling increase. The Center produced a comprehensive analysis of S.J. Res. 10 with an extensive history of federal spending to demonstrate the urgent need for such an amendment.

AGENDA FOR STATE ACTION

In National Review, the Weekly Standard, the Daily Caller, and on television, radio, and newspapers throughout Texas, the Center for Tenth Amendment Studies has consistently advocated limited government, economic freedom, and self-reliance—the principles that made our country great. The Center stands against a federal government that seeks the solution to every problem through government, that seeks to stifle diversity in the name of uniformity, and that wants to insinuate itself into every aspect of our lives.

The Center worked to protect our liberty from a federal government that wants to control every aspect of our health care—relationships with our doctors, health insurance choices, and the ability to experiment with health care regulation within the states. The Center assisted in developing the Health Care Compact, which will return health care funding to the states and give them the right to regulate whatever aspects of health care they might wish to regulate, suspending the operation of federal law correspondingly. The Health Care Compact passed as part of SB 7 in the special session at the end of June.

ENERGY

One of the Center’s goals of the 82nd session was to formulate policies based on rigorous cost-benefit analyses and factual data to systemically restrain state and federal regulators. We worked to educate Texas policymakers on the importance of avoiding state government’s centralized planning of our still entrepreneurial, productive energy sector. Success came as the House refused to move SB 15, the Texas Energy Policy Act, after swift passage by the Senate. This onerous bill would have created an Energy Policy Council within the Public Utility Commission composed of legislators, agency officials, and academics, but no representatives from the energy industry.

As a preeminent authority on energy and the environment, Kathleen Hartnett White was invited to testify before the U.S. Subcommittee on Energy and Power, U.S. Committee on Energy and Commerce, and the U.S. House of Representatives on EPA’s Green House Gases and Clean Air Act regulations. She was also invited to work with the U.S. House Energy & Commerce Committee and the Science, Space and Technology Committee to structure a series of hearings about EPA regulatory initiatives, and to provide background information and technical data on the issues.

GOVERNANCE

November’s elections, budgetary constraints, and Environmental Protection Agency (EPA) overreach led to a positive change in Texas’ policy landscape as voters sent 38 new representatives to the Capitol, many of whom championed limiting the size and scope of government. The budgetary challenges of the session also dampened, if not precluded, bills to increase federal regulatory authority. We continue to fight against further attempts to implement environmental policies that will cripple economic growth and prosperity.

The Foundation joined forces with Salem Communications on “Free American Energy Now,” an outreach campaign to increase public awareness of ways in which federal environmental policy is impeding U.S. economic recovery and energy independence. Members of the Armstrong Center for Energy & the Environment and the Foundation appeared on weekly 10-minute segments on Dr. Bill Bennett’s “Morning in America” and the Hugh Hewitt radio programs to discuss these issues. The project’s kick-off event included a luncheon hosted by Dr. Bennett and a live broadcast from Austin’s own Alamo Drafthouse Cinema at the Ritz, featuring Foundation president and CEO Brooke Rollins.

K-12 Education
The Center for Education Policy provides market-based solutions to improve public education in Texas through school choice, competition, and greater spending transparency

K-12 EDUCATION QUALITY
During the 82nd session, the Center for Education Policy worked successfully with the Texas Coalition for a Competitive Workforce, including testifying before the House Public Education Committee to defend the education quality and accountability gains made from the 80th Texas Legislature’s HB 3. The Center also worked with Rep. Ryan Guillen’s office to draft a bill designed to improve virtual education access and quality in Texas. The bill was designed to model the Foundation’s vision for the future of virtual education and blended learning—exploring new frontiers in learning technologies, and creating a virtual learning environment in Texas that encourages flexible, open participation for school districts and private online education providers. Unfortunately, the bill did not make it out of committee.

K-12 SCHOOL FINANCE
Efficiency in education refers to creating a school funding system in Texas that ensures Texas taxpayers get the most for every dollar they spend. To achieve this goal, the Center worked closely with Rep. Ken Paxton to promote a bill that would have enabled education tax credits in Texas. Though the bill did manage to get a hearing before the House Appropriations Committee, it, like most school finance bills, did not make it out of committee.

Issues during the 82nd Texas Legislature, was unable to make any meaningful movement through the House.

To further remind Texas policymakers that competition and other fundamental reforms are the key to a more effective, efficient education system, Center policy analyst James Golsan published “Texas School Finance: A Call for Reform,” which was distributed through both the House and Senate Education Committees to illustrate that more money is not the solution to improving education in Texas.

CHARTER SCHOOLS
The Center has worked hard to open up Texas charter school policy to allow maximum access, and encouraged lawmakers to consider options like private school vouchers to create competition for our monopolistic public education system. The Center worked with Rep. Bill Zedler to produce legislation for removal of the charter school cap. The Legislative Budget Board placed a substantial fiscal note on the bill, rendering it unable to move out of the House Public Education Committee.

Representative Jerry Madden (center) discusses online learning opportunities for Texas students with Representative Bill Zedler (right) and another attendee of an education Policy Primer held at the Foundation’s offices.

PROPERTY RIGHTS
At the heart of the Center for Economic Freedom’s work is protecting private property. Though the debate over property rights often centers on eminent domain abuse, property rights can also be violated by intrusive regulations and a runaway civil justice system.

Last year, the Center’s multi-year efforts in eminent domain paid off when a comprehensive reform bill—SB 18—was signed into law. This bill adds significant protections for private property rights, many of which originated from the Center’s research. These include prohibiting eminent domain takings that are not for a public use, allowing cities, counties, and school districts to take land only for a “public use” rather than a “public purpose,” and beginning to empower owners to repurchase their property if it is not used for the use for which it was taken. This work on property rights is bearing fruit in the courts as well, as the Foundation is inserting itself into the judicial process with amicus briefs, research, and commentary on the courts’ actions. Several recent rulings by the Texas Supreme Court have begun to shift the balance of power from condemors to property owners.

ELECTRICITY AND ENERGY
Since 2005, the Center has fought to protect Texas’ world class electricity market from re-regulation by policymakers who don’t like market outcomes. This session, we testified repeatedly against certain provisions in the Public Utility Commission of Texas (PUC) Sunset bill—SB 661—that would have unnecessarily increased the PUC’s regulatory authority over the market. The bill did not pass.

CIVIL JUSTICE
The Center has also participated in the legislative debates on tort reform since 1995. The result of these debates is that Texans today can—more often than not—enter a courtroom with a reasonable expectation that justice will be done. In 2011, the Foundation supported adopting a “loser pays” system and various other procedural reforms to help increase access to courts and reduce the costs of litigation. We wrote the most extensive research paper released on the issue, and testified on the loser pays bill—HB 274—multiple times. The bill passed the Legislature and was signed into law, further increasing access to justice in Texas.

HOMESTEAD & WINDSTORM INSURANCE
Texas Department of Insurance (TDI) sunset legislation finally passed after two legislative sessions. The bill took modest steps promoted in the Center’s own sunset report on TDI to move Texas closer to a true file-and-use system with less regulatory interference from TDI.

TELECOMMUNICATIONS
The Center’s comprehensive research on deregulating the telecommunications market helped the passage and signing into law of SB 980, the omnibus telecommunications deregulation bill. This legislation will allow new technology and innovation such as Voice Over Internet Protocol (VoIP), broadband, and cable to compete in the marketplace.
The Center for Effective Justice works to reduce the negative human and economic impact of crime on victims and communities.

A NEW CRIMINAL JUSTICE DISCOURSE
The Center for Effective Justice is about creating a new discourse for criminal justice and corrections in Texas and the nation. For far too long, corrections budgets in every state have grown at breakneck speed with little oversight or endeavor for efficiency. The Center for Effective Justice has begun to change that pattern and is at the forefront of the new criminal justice conversation.

In 2011, the Center worked to educate policymakers on efficient and effective methods of criminal justice, crime prevention, corrections, incarceration, and supervision. One of the R2nd session’s success stories included trimming $101.9 million in the adult corrections budget in Texas.

In August, the Center hosted a panel discussion at the State Policy Network Conference in Seattle to address why conservatives should take a greater interest in juvenile justice reform. Speakers included Texas Rep. Jerry Madden, former New York City prosecutor Susan Broderick, University of Cincinnati Professor John Wright, and University of San Francisco Professor Dan Macallair.

To help control the growth of government in unnecessary and overbroad criminal penalties, the Center filed an amicus brief in the 11th Circuit Court of Appeals in a major overcriminalization case.

RIGHT ON CRIME
The Center is the undisputed leader of the growing movement supporting free market criminal justice policy. Our Center for Effective Justice is leading a paradigm shift in Texas and across the country with Right On Crime, its revolutionary conservative approach to corrections. Right On Crime has brought some of the biggest names in conservative thought to create new ideas and new leadership for criminal justice. Right on Crime has quickly become the go-to source for policymakers seeking to increase criminal justice efficiency and effectiveness in their state.

In its first full year, the ROC initiative received more than 200 national media hits, including mentions in The New York Times, Forbes, The Financial Times, The Guardian, Newsweek, CNN.com, The Daily Caller, Pajamas Media, The Huffington Post, The Associated Press, The Economist, The Chicago Tribune, and many more. Right On Crime also received several international mentions due to interviews that Center director Marc Levin conducted with British and Canadian media. Right On Crime received significant attention on talk radio outlets across the country, including 40 appearances on programs from San Diego to Connecticut and nationally-syndicated programming such as NPR and the Lars Larson Show.

Due to its outstanding work in Texas, the Center was invited to present model legislation to introduce incentive-funding in the juvenile justice system before the Public Safety and Elections Task Force at the ALEC States and Nation Policy Summit in Phoenix, Arizona.

The Laffer Center for Supply-Side Economics

“The economic issue has never been whether one is a liberal or conservative, Democrat or Republican, or other such misleading taxonomic delineation. The issue revolves exclusively around one’s perception of human behavior.” - Arthur B. Laffer, Ph.D., writing in the Los Angeles Times in 1981

As Chairman of the Laffer Center, Dr. Laffer made appearances during the year to everyone from the like-minded audience at the Heritage Foundation’s Resource Bank meeting in Dallas, to a luncheon debate with Alice Rivlin, Ph.D., director of the Office of Management and Budget under President Bill Clinton. As the Laffer Center looks ahead, its goal is to cultivate the next generation of supply-side thinkers to continue Dr. Laffer’s enduring legacy as both a respected economist and a communicator able to articulate complex economic ideas in easily understandable terms.

Dr. Arthur Laffer talks with Senator Phil Gramm and Texas Tech University System Chancellor Kent Hance following the launch event for the Laffer Center for Supply-Side Economics. Dr. Laffer provides the keynote address at the Heritage Foundation’s annual Resource Bank.
Rollins recognized by Texas Monthly as one of 25 most influential leaders in Texas.

The year 2011 kicked off in fine fashion when Texas Monthly’s February issue listed Foundation president and CEO Brooke Rollins as one of the top 25 leaders who shape Texas. This recognition came after eight years of tireless work, in which she took TPPF to new heights of influence and relevance in Austin—and in Washington, D.C. The listing as a top-25 Texan isn’t just a feather in our cap; it’s a real testament to the efficacy and significance of the hardest-working policy foundation in the state-level sphere—and the woman who made it so.
Events & Outreach

THE FOUNDATION IS REMARKABLY EFFECTIVE at mobilizing allies across the country and communicating our message to policymakers nationwide. Our Center for Tenth Amendment Studies was the first in the nation to recommend an interstate compact as a tool to limit the federal government’s growth. We collaborated with the American Legislative Exchange Council to have the compact adopted as “model legislation” for its 2,000 members, about 900 of whom are state legislators from across the country. Thanks to the Center’s in-depth research, a national outreach event, and coordination of a multi-state effort, the compact has been passed in Texas, Georgia, Missouri, and Oklahoma, and is being considered in eight other states.

As part of our efforts to overturn ObamaCare and raise awareness of the devastating consequences of this bill, the Foundation has submitted three amicus briefs to the Supreme Court of the United States in the main lawsuit challenging the constitutionality of ObamaCare.

The Center for Effective Justice’s “Right On Crime” initiative was named the most significant criminal justice development of 2011 by The Crime Report. Right On Crime reached another milestone in 2011 when former Florida Governor Jeb Bush became an official signatory of Right On Crime’s Statement of Principles. He joins a long list of nationally-known Right On Crime supporters, including Edwin Meese, attorney general during the Reagan administration; former House Speaker Newt Gingrich; Grover Norquist, president of Americans for Tax Reform; Asa Hutchinson, a former director of the Drug Enforcement Administration; and Dr. William Bennett, former U.S. Secretary of Education and a former “drug czar.”

The U.S. Census projects that Hispanics will account for 42 percent of Texas’ population by 2015. The Foundation conducted strategic outreach—in the form of four roundtable discussions across the state—to share our message of free markets, limited government, and individual responsibility with this important demographic.
Investing in Liberty

“I’m asked to support hundreds of groups, but the Texas Public Policy Foundation has proven its effectiveness promoting the Founding Fathers’ principles, and now protecting our country against Washington overreach. And TPPF shows me exactly how my investment is being used. As a contributor, I appreciate that.”

L.C. “CHAZ” NEELY, TPPF BENEFACIOR SINCE 1991

As the Foundation’s work becomes more important to the national debate, our benefactors are funding the initiatives that will change the course of the future. Their contributions are executing major media campaigns that will educate millions about energy policy. Their investments are providing for model legislation on Medicaid and criminal justice. Their sacrifices are moving forward pension reform and the opening of once-regulated industries. Their time is now.

Like never before, Texas Public Policy Foundation members have provided the funding to get the important work done. We are stewards of their trust, and allocate every dollar to change our state, our nation, and our world.

We take this trust very seriously. Our board takes a principled approach to investment just as it does to public policy, and it works tirelessly to ensure our Stability Fund is as liquid and safe as possible. Even in the current economic downturn, the Foundation's work will move forward—ensuring our ability to carry on the fight for liberty in Texas, and the nation, with your help.
